The cache of letters that author Sigrid MacRae shares with us in her memoir, A World Elsewhere, is of the literary variety. In fact, these letters are so good that they deserve to be locked away in the Moroccan box that Sigrid receives from her mother, Aimée Ellis von Hoyningen-Huene, erstwhile protagonist of a fractured fairy tale, a Connecticut Yankee in a crumbling White Russian court.

The main significance of Poirier's classic - opposing the "myth and symbol" school of American Studies criticism - is likely to be undervalued today. Similarly, the book's critique of vulgar historicism - that the works it studies are important precisely because they reject the actual world and invent their own - is likely to be found wanting ...
