In an oceanic environment, the photic zone is the zone where light can be received, it's usually from 0 to 200 m deep, but this depth can be modified by the turbidity of the water. The aphotic zone is the zone where no light is received, it goes from 200 to the bottom of the sea. The difference is about the primary production and the oxygen concentration and so the pH of the water.

How does the photic zone differ from the aphotic zone ...
