This is an early novella by Kurt Vonnegut that was rejected by the Saturday Evening Post in the 1940s while its author was still working for General Electric. Although it brings in a number of themes from his work, Basic Training strikes me almost as juvenilia. There is a single sentence at the beginning of Chapter II which reminds me of the later Vonnegut:

Rites of Initiation and Eucharist receive much more attention, which is rightly deserved. A Confessor's Handbook provides good training and assistance for seminarians wishing to learn more about this sacrament, as well as to continuing clergy looking to become better confessors. The general approach can be summed up as, "Why is this person here?"
