LPC stand for Low Pin Count - it is the chip used to connect all of the "legacy" PC components on motherboards. For example it will control the PS/2, floppy, parallel and serial ports. Before the LPC all of these devices were in the ISA bus and once boards stopped including them ISA slots, they switched to LPC because it was a simplifier interface for the small number of integrated devices ...

I found an interesting article here that explains the difference. It appears that it was actually called ATA, but IDE and PATA were just different names used by different branding. It just goes to show how much competition (and money) there is amongst computer related companies to have their particular brand of the current technology accepted as the world standard.

A reverse proxy can be used to provide security for internal resources. Two common ones are Microsoft ISA server, and Apache with mod_proxy. As an example, if you have a Microsoft Exchange server in your internal LAN, but want to give access to internet users for Outlook Web Access (OWA), you could place your server in the DMZ (NOT RECOMMENDED), or open ports in the firewall to your internal ...
