@VoidKing I know this comes half a year later and you might have figured this out yet long ago, but it's really quite simple. By using select you create a set with columns and rows, and by design these rows can be inserted into another table with an equal amount of columns.You can even use a mixture of literals and values.

How do I insert multiple rows WITHOUT repeating the ...

When writing a new script, I like to make sure I know which DC my AD cmdlets are talking to. I do this by using the -Server flag, but rather than hard-coding a specific DC into my scripts, I always use the closest writable DC by starting all my scripts with this line:
